RESEARCH INTERESTS

My first and primary research interest is to examine sociocultural influences on parenting, parent-child relationships, and child development. My second research interest is to develop culturally grounded self-report parenting measures. My third area of research is translational in that it identifies evidence-based practices for engaging culturally, ethnically, linguistically, and socio-economically diverse families in educational settings. To address my research goals, I draw on quantitative, qualitative, and mixed methods.

TEACHING

Teaching Philosophy

My teaching goals are to support students' knowledge building and critical thinking skills. I work toward these goals by challenging students to apply multiple perspectives on course topics and by encouraging students to link classroom content to their own life experiences. My teaching implements an assortment of learning activities and provides different functions of assessment at specific times across the learning process so that students with varying learning styles are provided opportunities to learn and demonstrate their knowledge. I believe that writing is a skill that improves with practice, and that it is my responsibility as a teacher to provide opportunities for students to practice, strengthen, and organize their writing and expression of ideas. Lastly, I implement collaborative learning activities so that students can teach, learn, and support one another's learning throughout the semester.
